Can children and young people consent to their own medical treatment? Consent issues involving children and young people are complex. This article examines the legal obligations of general practitioners when obtaining consent to medical treatment from patients who are less than 18 years of age.

Keywords: informed consent, adolescent; child

---

Case study

The patient, 15 years of age, asked her general practitioner if everything she said during the consultation would be kept ‘secret’. The GP replied that she could not provide an absolute guarantee but, generally, any information provided to her by a patient would be kept confidential. The patient then told the GP that she had a boyfriend who was 16 years of age and she would like to start taking the oral contraceptive pill. She was adamant that she did not want her parents to know that she was sexually active and on the pill. The GP was uncertain of her legal position in treating a patient, 15 years of age, without the consent of her parents.

The age at which a person becomes an ‘adult’ in Australia is 18 years. Consent for the medical treatment of patients less than 18 years of age is generally provided by parents. However, there are circumstances in which patients under the age of 18 can consent to their own medical treatment.

The common law recognises that a child or young person may have the capacity to consent to medical treatment on their own behalf, and without their parents’ knowledge. This common law position is based on a 1986 English House of Lords judgment, Gillick v Wisbech Area Health Authority. In this case, the issue to be determined was whether a medical practitioner could provide contraceptive advice and prescribe contraceptives to a patient under the age of 16 years, without the prior knowledge or consent of her parents. The Department of Health and Social Security had issued guidance to area health services in England that medical practitioners could prescribe the oral contraceptive pill to a girl below the age of 16 years without the consent or knowledge of her parent, if acting in good faith to protect the best interests of the patient. Mrs Gillick, who was the mother of five daughters, sought a declaration from the Court that the guidance was unlawful on the basis (in part) that a health practitioner could not give advice or treatment about contraception to a person below the age of 16 years without the consent of his or her parent(s) because this would be inconsistent with parental rights. The majority of the House of Lords ultimately rejected her claim. The Court determined that there were circumstances in which a child or young person could consent to their own medical treatment. In order to do so, the child or young person must have a ‘sufficient understanding and intelligence to enable him or her to fully understand what is proposed’. This is often referred to as ‘Gillick competence’ or the ‘mature minor’.

The level of maturity required to provide consent will vary with the nature and complexity of the medical treatment. For example, the level of maturity required to provide consent for the treatment of a superficial graze will be much less than that required to provide consent for the commencement of the oral contraceptive pill. In Gillick, the judges determined that the concept of absolute authority by a parent over a child or young person was no longer acceptable. Because this absolute authority no longer existed, the House of Lords held that even though it will, in most cases, be in the patient’s best interests to have parental Consent to medical treatment: the mature minor

Sara Bird MBBS, MFM(clin), FRACGP, is Manager, Medico-Legal and Advisory Services, MDA National. sbird@mdanational.com.au.

Conflict of interest: none declared.

References
1. Gillick v West Norfolk and Wisbech Health Authority [1986] 1 AC 112.
2. Secretary, Department of Health and Community Services v JWB and SMB (1992) 175 CLR 218.

Risk management strategies

It is important that general practitioners are aware of the legal position with respect to consent to medical treatment of a child or young person, especially in circumstances in which the patient requests that their parents are not informed.

Depending on the specific circumstances, consent to medical treatment of a patient less than 18 years of age may be provided by either the: patient parent or legal guardian court (eg. for permanent sterilisation procedures) other agencies (eg. in NSW the consent of the Guardianship Tribunal is required for ‘special medical treatment’. Special medical treatment includes sterilisation, vasectomy or tubal occlusion).

It should be noted that no consent is required in emergency situations if it is impractical to do so. In the case of a medical emergency (where treatment is immediately necessary to save the life of a patient or to prevent serious injury to their health), and the patient is not able to consent to the required treatment at the time, a medical practitioner may perform emergency treatment.

While in many cases it is preferable to obtain the consent of both the child and the parent for medical treatment, there may be specific circumstances in which the best interests of the child or young person may be served without the parents’ consent. If GPs are uncertain about their legal obligations in a particular situation involving the consent to medical treatment of a child or young person, they should seek advice from a colleague and/or their medical defence organisation.

Author
Sara Bird MBBS, MFM(clin), FRACGP, is Manager, Medico-Legal and Advisory Services, MDA National. sbird@mdanational.com.au.

Conflict of interest: none declared.

This article has been provided by MDA National. This information is intended as a guide only and should not be taken as legal or clinical advice. We recommend you always contact your indemnity provider when advice in relation to your liability for matters covered under your insurance policy is required.

MDA National Insurance is a wholly owned subsidiary of the Medical Defence Association of Western Australia (Incorporated) ARBN 055 801 771 trading as MDA National incorporated in Western Australia. The liability of members is limited.

correspondence afp@racgp.org.au